claim that human rights are unconditional: they do not have to be earned, and they cannot be alienated. That is how we regard human rights in theory, but our practice seems to be different. We act in ways that deny people at least some of their human rights, and we claim to be justified in doing so.

This is not in itself something new. The modern destruction of the human has been proceeding for 500 years through the school, the military, the reformatory. The stopwatch and the ruler, the factory, the ghetto and the market all contributed to the industrial production of a conditional and dependent humanity.
